Encouraging Male-engagement in Family Planning

Pinky was assigned the role of counselling women on their contraceptive options in the remote Rajasthan townships of Sanganer and Bassi in 2010. At first, she faced difficulty to counsel women, who had little education and had been denied decision making autonomy in patriarchal households. However, with her persistence and empathy, Pinky was able to not only understand the challenges her clients faced in accessing contraception but also offered them solutions. As a result, uptake of contraception by women in these areas began to rise. In 2013, FRHS India began a focused drive to increase awareness on vasectomy and encouraged men to adopt the method. Having already won the confidence of the women in the community, Pinky was well placed to promote the procedure among their husbands and male family members. Despite facing mockery, she didn't give up and helped the men realise the benefits of vasectomy. She now plays an important role in supporting government counsellors to provide comprehensive counselling and information on family planning methods to women visiting public health facilities.
